

The FCC should not implement any proposal that would lessen Indiana's Telephone Privacy Law.

I consider telemarketing calls to be stealing (theft). They are using my phone line without my permission. I pay a monthly fee in order to have phone line for my personal use. Therefore, telemarketing causes this service to be unavailable similar to when somebody steals my money or other effects which become unavailable until they are returned.

Indiana's current laws have provided me and my family with some peace and quite inside our home. The ability to live within my home without constant interruption from telemarketers trying to pawn off their useless products and services.

No proposals should lessen the effect that Indiana's current laws have had.
